Marion Z. Snider

JAN 12, 1917 - MAR 22, 2007

When Marion Snider graduated from Sweet Briar College in Virginia, she wanted to work for a newspaper.

To win her first job as a writer and reporter, she applied to a hometown newspaper, the St. Petersburg Evening Independent, owned and edited by her father, L. Chauncey Brown.

He turned her down. "He said no, there were enough newspaper people in the family," she recalled in a 1994 interview. He referred not only to himself but to his father, Maj. Lew Brown, who had preceded him as Independent editor and is remembered for his famous offer of a free newspaper on a day when the sun didn't shine.

Not to be denied, she went to one of her father's editors, Archie Dunlap. He hired her. For about a week after she got the job she and her father rode to work together. In silence.

Mrs. Snider, a playwright and biographer of her grandfather and whose girlhood memories stretched back to the city's boom days, died Thursday (March 22, 2007) at Bon Secours Maria Manor. She was 90.

For her entry into journalism, she recalled: "I was paid $12 a week. They were taking out Social Security by then, and I was really upset over that. But I had a wonderful time. I was the only girl in the news room and the youngest of the cub reporters."

Born in the Roser Park area, she spoke fondly of St. Petersburg. "All during my youth, we had a lively, busy downtown," she recalled. "And everybody came out at night to walk on Central Avenue because it was cooler. I loved it here in the summer too, when everyone else went away and there were just a few of us left here."

She cut short her journalism career to marry Robert Alan Zaiser in 1939. A West Point graduate, he flew bombers in World War II and was killed in an airplane crash in 1947. In 1973, she married Robert E. Lee Snider, also a 1938 West Point graduate.
